

Jeffrey Longhofer, Ph.D., LISW, has worked as an academic and applied anthropologist in areas related to health and mental health practice and the cross-cultural study of mental illness. He has served as editor and associate editor of journals for the American Anthropological Association and the Society for Applied Anthropology. He has also served on the editorial board of the International Journal of Psychoanalysis. His early work focuses on cultural constructions of health and illness and old age among the Mennonites and Old Order Amish. In his early and continuing work he has investigated the organizational culture and patterns of communication among cancer patients, family members, and practitioners. He has recently conducted ethnographic research in child care settings and among children with parents suffering from life-threatening illnesses.. His work is aimed at understanding the multi-level sites where chronic mental and physical illness intersect to produce biographical disruptions, narrative reconstructions, renegotiated senses of selfhood and positive action aimed at the production of well being. His use of qualitative methods to explore relationships between culture and human services in health and mental health has resulted in a publication on polypharmacy and related practices and what he has called a grid of social relations for the management of medication in communities. He is coauthor of a forthcoming book for Columbia University Press: Toward Relational Case Management. He is working on a second book manuscript (with Jerry Floersch), "Qualitative Methods: A Pocket Guide". Later in his career he returned to school to earn a graduate degree in social work and recently completed his training in adult psychoanalysis. He is now an Associate Professor at the Mandel School of Applied Social Sciences, an Adjunct Associate Professor of Anthropology, and Clinical Instructor in Psychiatry at Case Western Reserve University.
