Claudia J. Coulton is Distinguished University Professor, Mandel School of Applied Social Sciences, Case Western Reserve University, where she is also the Lillian F. Harris Professor of Urban Research and Social Change. She is the founding director of the Center on Urban Poverty and Community Development and oversees a multidisciplinary team working to better understand systemic forces that produce distressed neighborhoods and what individuals, organizations and policies can do to reverse these conditions. Under her leadership, the Center has built a model capacity to provide data for community initiatives, including a dynamic neighborhood indicators system, a parcel-based property tracking system and a longitudinal multi-agency integrated data system for children. Coulton is one of the founders of the National Neighborhood Indicators Partnership and has served as research adviser to many community change programs including Aspen Institute's Roundtable on Comprehensive Community Initiatives, Annie E. Casey Foundation's Making Connections initiative and the Invest in Children program. She is currently leading a Grand Challenge for Social Work, Harnessing Technology for Social Good. Her recent studies focus on processes of residential mobility and neighborhood identity in poor communities; the impact of the built and social environment on outcomes for children and families; and the potential and methodological challenges of using linked administrative records for social and health research. She is the author of numerous scientific publications and policy reports.
